

The New Zealand Gazette.

Published by Authority.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 25, 1861.

1. The Governor has reason to believe that the disaffection, which is spreading through the Maori Population, is everywhere encouraged, and has, in some instances, been created by speeches and writings circulated through the country by means of the press,

2. The publication of opinions (especially when emanating from persons of high authority) impugning the justice and legality of the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government, has a most injurious effect on the minds of the Native race.

3. The motives of the authors of such publications may be most conscientious; but the Natives, in their present state of civilization, cannot be expected to discriminate between the right of opposition by lawful means and of resistance by force of arms to that which they are taught to believe by persons holding influential positions is unjust and illegal.

4. The Governor fully recognises the right of every British subject freely to discuss, criticise, and censure the acts of the Government, and, when the danger now threatening has passed away, he does not desire to see that right restricted.

5. There are, however, occasions when the unrestrained use of such a right becomes manifestly dangerous to the community, and he feels it his duty to state that such an occasion now exists in this Colony.

6. The Governor, therefore, appeals to every loyal subject of Her Majesty to refrain from an agitation which tends to prolong a sanguinary resistance to Her Majesty's authority, is fraught with danger to the lives and property of the Colonists, and imperils the very existence of the Native race.

Government House,

Auckland, 24th January, 1861.
